How to Make Your Rainy Day Hat-Protty Bonnets for Evening Wear-Two Costumes in Cloth-The Craze for Heads.

[COPYRIGHT, 1892.]

in sure you want a real pretty, cheap rain hat, one that will stand almost shabby and ugly if the rain you started out in should happen to suddenly cease and the sun should shine out brightly before you reached home. This sort of thing happens very often, even these

you. Curve it slightly downward at the

Take the pieces of felt that are left over, and make some pretty loops and ends to trim the front. Buy a few fancy quills—there are some pretty ones to be had that add a wonderful piquancy to a plain hat—and combine with your felt trimming. If you want to introduce a little astrakhan, all right. It may add to the good effect; but if you use only the quills and the felt, and combine them tastefully, you will need nothing more. Such a hat costs almost nothing and will stand almost any weather or treatment.

Evening hats are particularly delicate and beautiful this winter. The big ones of light colored felts and beavers are all one mass of pale colorings—in velvets, in prince of Wales tips, in lace and fine braids. The small hats have no crowns. They have only three or four fine wires for a brim, covered with a pale shade of velvet, a few loops of velvet in front, a couple of aigrettes or a bunch of fine flowers, and strings.
The crown is omitted altogether, so that the elaborate coffure may rise unhindered to any height desired.

I saw a very dainty one the other evening. Two small twists of pink velvet rested on the lady's head. At the front were a few gathers of some soft, creamy lace, and resting between lay a tiny fur head of beautiful fawn brown. Then a little tiara of brilliants crossed the folds of lace.

Another had a ruche of black lace all around in place of the velvet band, and a bunch of the pale blue tips in front, with one black aigrette and two big gold pins. The lady's pale blue bodied was almost hidden by a lovely Marie Antoinette fielu in mousseline de soie, edged with lace, that was caught on the shoulders with standing bows.

Have you seen the new miniature pelerine? They call it pelerine in Paris, but it's morevike a big collar with a boa hanging from it. It is made of a little bit of a shoulder cape, a cape that just reaches the shoulders, but doesn't cover them. This cape, usually made of black velvet, is trimmed with white Mongolian fur. From the cape rises the highest rolling collar you ever saw; also in black velvet, and also trimmed with white fur. Then two long bands of velvet, about four inches wide, are fastened to the collar in front and fall loosely therefrom to the ground. First, however, the velvet is turned over at the top several inches, before it is gathered to the collar, so that it forms a little jabot. The outside edges, the bottom, and the top edge, which falls over, are all trimmed with fur. Five little tails hang from the bottom.

Then there's the new Medici collar that doesn't stop at the neek, but extends itself into a small cape, just cov ering the shoulders, no more, and fit ting saugly over the coat of last season that you're trying to invest with a outy, fashionable air. If the collar a fur edge, and a small head-and tail bon round it, you will be far from unsuccessful in your attempts.

An outdoor costume, an entirely new one, I assure you—the material is cloth, I ful lick.-Jury gray-blue cloth, combined largely with tan-colored cloth. The skirt flares well tan-colored cloth. The skirt flares well at the edge—we're getting nearer the hoopskirt daily, you will note—and has a flounce of tan, headed with marten sable and pinked at the bottom in very deep points. Below the hips behold another band, the fac simile of the lower in every respect. A little farther up see a corselet of tan color, headed with fur and edged with a point of white and silver embroiders. Then look was and silver embroidery. Then look upon the bodice proper in blue, cut open and low in front, filled in with a tan chemisette. See a tan collar edged with sable, and tan sleeves with blue puffs, and lo! you have caught the dress in its

Would you look upon another? This one is pale gray made of fine cloth. Λ small velvet border finishes the skirt. There's a pocket—such a blessing—on each hip, outlined with three black velvet bands and fastened with a large velvet batton. In front, beneath a full waistcoat of black surah, the gray bodice crosses, and is carried over to the left side in a square flap that but-tons there. Over the waistcoat falls a black velvet cape, short, and turning back in front in big revers lined with glowing crimson. The red gives the effect, it brings out everything in the

By the way, the Russian is not altogether dead. It dies hard. It rouses itself occasionally and starts up with something of its old strength, making no small impression on those that stand around. Its lengthcontinues to grow, both above the waist and below. The long waist line of the Russian forms a complete contrast to the short bodiced Empire; and it is difficult to believe, when one sees two women standing side by side, one clad in an Empire and the other in a Russian, that they are actu-ally endowed with similitude of form. Some pretty Russian blouses have fur collars, fur edges and fur girdles, as well as elbow puffed sleeves caught in a band of fur.

The small neck boas are such a comfort, are they not? They can be bought for so little, and they're so very becoming. For all the alleged softness and sympathy of women we wear those lit-tle fur heads without a bit of compunetion. We put them on our hats, coats, all over our gowns, on our boas and at the amount of additional pain our latest fad has brought into the world. Where's the society that started the crusade against the wholesale slaughter of the birds? It ought to add a new branch to its work embracing such a reform. The use of birds has become less popular since so many fashionable women pledged themselves to wear no more; so that the society has been able to rest somewhat from its labors. But here is an opportunity for it to strike out in a new direction.

Would the world of women stand by them? Or will those poor little fur heads be hunted down until they are utterly cut off, until they vanish for all time from the face of this world of EVA A. SCHUBERT.

GOOD CAUSE FOR SHUDDERING. Why Passing a Book Shop Made the Ris-ing Author Turn Pale.

The Rising Author was strolling along the avenue with a friend. When came to a certain much-frequented book store the friend said: "This is the day the Weekly Thunderer gets out. Let me go and buy my copy. Besides, we may look around a little."

But the other shuddered and shook his head. "No," he replied, "I won't go in with you. I'll wait here."

It was so strange a thing and lingered so in the friend's mind that he men-tioned it at the club that evening. And they all shook their heads and said it was queer, very queer. Moreover, each and every one of them made opportunities to lure the Rising Author towards book stores and hear and see, separately and individually, his shifty excuses

At least a friend more cruel than the rest said to him: "Old man, what's the matter? Why do you shun the shops where your kind of wares are sold? What's up?"

The Rising Author groaned. "O, you're all so blind. Why, man alive, my new book's just out. It's on the counters now. Bir! Why, those places are positively ghastly. To go in and ask, with a sickly, feeble smile. How is the—the book selling? Then the polite, deprecatory attempt at hiding the miserable truth. The customer who comes in and picks up the new creation glances at title page and lays it down again to pass on to other things. I stood those things for awhile. But a man must stop somewhere. I could stand it no longer. No, no, anything but that! Don't ask me."

The air of the club now bears for the Rising Author a sort of commiseration. His fellows understand now.-Chicago Tribune.
